Ram Mandir

The Ram Mandir in Ayodhya is a notable example of contemporary temple architecture in India. The temple, designed by architect Chandrakant Sompura, incorporates traditional Indian design elements while utilizing modern construction techniques. The structure features a grand main temple with intricately carved pillars and detailed stonework, emphasizing the rich cultural heritage of India. The temple complex, built primarily from pink sandstone, reflects a blend of historical reverence and modern engineering, symbolizing a significant cultural and spiritual landmark in Ayodhya.

Gate of Day of India

The Gateway of India in Mumbai, designed by British architect George Wittet, is a prime example of Indo-Saracenic architecture. Completed in 1924, it commemorates King George V and Queen Mary's 1911 visit to India. The structure features a grand basalt arch, rising 26 meters, adorned with intricate stone carvings that blend traditional Indian and Western designs, symbolizing Mumbai's historical and cultural heritage.

Mysore Palace

The Mysore Palace in Karnataka is a stunning example of Indo-Saracenic architecture. Designed by British architect Henry Irwin, the palace was completed in 1912 and features a blend of Hindu, Mughal, Rajput, and Gothic styles. The grand structure, built with grey granite and deep pink marble domes, is adorned with intricate carvings, stained glass, and beautifully crafted columns. The palace's expansive halls, ornate ceilings, and exquisite courtyards reflect the opulence and cultural heritage of the Wadiyar dynasty, making it a major historical and architectural landmark in Mysore.
